

The doctoral program within social communication and media studies comprises general courses of the Doctoral School of Social Sciences and individual research plans focusing on media and/or social communication realized in cooperation with the Institute of Social Communication and Media Studies. Students of the School will elaborate their research projects supervised by scholars appointed by the Institute under the rules established during the launch of the School.

Institute of Social Communication and Media Studies realizes research projects within the fields of analog and digital media and their local, global, network, social, mass realizations and perspectives; historical and contemporary social, cultural, political communication; media languages, semiotics, journalistic genres; information science and bibliology. In particular, we offer supervision of theoretical projects on journalistic genres, spheres, and realizations of mediatization processes, philosophy of media and communication, media art, as well as empirical research projects on media and communication covering, i.e., media content production & reception, media-oriented social practices, the cultural status of media technologies, how media work in their political, social, economic, (pop)cultural contexts.